American experience that race creates intergenerational misperceptions, using history and myth as both a tool of force and bias. In 1961, African American activist Stokely Carmichael used the slogan "black power" to challenge the federal government to act on behalf of African Americans. This slogan became a symbol of the civil rights movement and was adopted by both African American and African American groups to express their anger and frustration with the slow pace of change in the United States. The slogan "black power" has since been used by various groups to express their commitment to racial justice and social change.
